Making Small Changes to Eat Healthier

As healthcare employees, we spend a majority of our time tending to the needs of others. Some of us even give advice on healthy habits and healthy eating. But are we listening to our own advice? Hectic schedules and long hours can make this challenging. Eating a balanced diet often takes a back seat to the convenience of fast-food options that don't serve in our best health interest.

How can we work to incorporate self care into our day-to-day schedule?

It's important to be aware of our meal habits. By making only small changes in our diets and setting practical goals, we can work toward achieving a healthier lifestyle. Let's make self-care one of our main priorities, not only for ourselves, but also to serve as role models to others. In order to get started with healthful eating, an awareness of any poor eating habits we may have is key—like eating when stressed, mindless eating, having frequent fast food meals, large portion-sized meals or irregular meal patterns.

Here are some tips for getting started to promote better eating:

- Establish routine meal patterns with consistent intake and portion sizes.
- Add more whole foods to your everyday diet.
- Avoid reliance on stimulants like caffeine.
- Prepare meals and snacks ahead of time.
- Add color to your plate, by choosing a variety of colorful fruits and vegetables.
- Eat foods high in antioxidants (like vegetables, berries, citrus fruits, almonds) or with fatty acids (fish like salmon and tuna).
- Choose smart options more often when dining in the cafeteria or from vending machines.
- Drink plenty of water.
- Make regular sleep a priority.

Change takes time. So begin with one or two of the tips noted. Then build from there.
